NATION

The following letter and reply we find among old clippings:

Madam: Most worthy of my admiration after long consideration, and much meditation, of the great reputation you possess in the nation, I have a strong inclination to become your relation. On your appreciation of the declaration, I will make preparation to move my situation to prove my admiration; and, if such obligation is worthy of observation, and can obtain confirmation, it will be an aggrandizement, beyond all calculation, of the joy and exaltation of life.

Yours,

REVERE DESPERATION.

Sir: I received your oration with much deliberation and a little consternation at the great infatuation of your weak imagination to show such veneration and on so slight a foundation. I suppose your admiration was the fruit of recreation, or had sprung from an inclination to display your education, by our enumeration or rather your multiplication of words of the same termination though of great variation in their respective signification. Now, without disputation, your laborious application to so tedious an occupation deserves commendation, and thinking imitation sufficient gratification, I am, without hesitation,

SALTY MODERATION.

The following extract of Verdant Green appeared in a New York paper some time since:

"Verdant had lived an unsophisticated life until the ripe age of 21. About this time, a neighbor of V.'s father engaged a governess from New York. V. met her at a picnic; and as she was the first lady he'd ever met that could make him feel at home in her society, he fell violently in love with her. His foolishness, under the skittish tutorage of the governess, wore rapidly away; and ere long he had consented to become her bridegroom. The bridal party stopped at a Côte d'azur hotel, and, after many a weary night, the momentum of a man's whole life arrived to Verdant. On two chairs were piled a purple osseous skirt, etc., and a gun to bear near the head of the bed the astrologer eyes of Verdant beheld a sight that freeze him with horror. There were false eyelids, false nipples, and false hair. In one number of water was a forget of false teeth from another a glass excreted at the crowded bridgefoot in. How long he stood, Verdant knoweth not; but after a while a hollow and strange voice from under the bed clothes addressed him thus:

"Why don't you come to bed, dear?"

"So I would, but (with a pouty expression) I don't know whether to get into bed or on the table."

A Queer Will.

The Vienna journals give a curious will left by a rich eccentric of a gentleman named Stanislaus Potzmann; who died in his 70th year, 1863, after bequeathing his fortune to all his 100 servants, to a nest of the poor, he set down an extraordinary clause instituting his heirs to be his legatees. M. François Léon, Hungarian by origin, and a notary by occupation in a little town near Vienna, found the testator at his dying condition, "my property," he wrote, "will belong to M. Léon, who he shall shake hands with at La Scala, in Milan, or the San Carlo, in Naples, the portico Colleto, in the upper part of the same, and that of Elvino, in the Sonnambula. I do not dispense of my death in this manner for the sake of being thought an original, but, having been present four years ago at an evening party in Vienna, I heard this gentleman sing a cavatina from each of those operas with a beautiful tenor voice. Therefore, I believe him likely to become an excellent artist. In my case, if the public likes him, he can console himself easily with three millions of florins (£300,000) which I leave him." M. Léon is at Naples for the last month, preparing to carry out the wishes of the deceased. The notary is not forty, has a well-tuned voice, and works night and day to learn as quickly as possible the two parts, with their pronunciation and singing. He will probably make a success, but the property is well worth the hazard.
